

Reflection on writing process

I consider myself a procrastinator/perfectionist writer. Without external pressure I usually write with heavy planning as a perfectionist; sometimes more than half of my writing document is notes about what I want to write. However, this often leads to me running out of time and I switch to a procrastinator style where I skip note and planning (mostly) and just write freely. I have tried a bit to change my processes by pushing the talker/procrastinator style to the front/away from the deadlines. This is because the main function of the procrastinator is to lower my standards and allow me to actually write, which I think I can use more of.